Excerpt from Latest Systems in Medicine: The Presidential Address Delivered to the Ohio State Medical Society, June, 1885 One fact in the history of medicine stands prominent it has always taken on the character of the age. In ancient times, and indeed down to a comparatively recent period, it was made a part of philosophy, and the history of one was the history of the other. Forced, then, to take its place in a rigid framework of doctrines, which included the mental, moral and physical world, and explained the economy of the universe, it had no independent existence, and moved but as a puppet. Again, it has always varied with the changes which its allied sciences have undergone. Thus, when chemistry was making brilliant discoveries, pathology and therapeutics became largely chemical; when physics was making rapid progress, vital actions, normal and abnormal, took on a mechanical aspect; under the influence of the discoveries of Newton, and the doctrines of Des Cartes, an attempt was made to give them even a mathematical character.
