Why oppose him, my dear? said Mrs. de Malassise, as he is so anxious to see the horse. Suppose he should have an attack of the nerves out here! what should we do? There, you hear, papa; why do you oppose me? I m going to have an attack of the nerves, I feel I am. Oh, let us go and see the horse then, pray, said Mr. de Malassise, resigning himself with rather a bad grace. They had followed their guide for about a quarter of a mile, when an empty hackney coach passed. The man stopped it, saying, Perhaps, sir, the lady will be tired if she walks all the way: had you not better take this hackney coach? I will get up on the box, and direct the driver. Why, you said it was only two steps, urged Mr. de Malassise. Oh, it is not far, replied the man. Yes, yes, let us have the coach, I can t walk anymore, exclaimed Eusebe. So, of course, they got into the hackney coach, while the man who had the horse to sell seated himself beside the coachman. On they went, right out of Paris, into the narrow streets of a suburb inhabited by very poor people. On they went still, while the houses became more scattered, and the roads were so bad that the horses could hardly get along. At last...
