Excerpt from The West Wind: A Story of Red Men and White in Old Wyoming At any rate, she presently realized, after how long or short a time she could not tell, that the situation called for immediate action. She covered the face of the man with her handkerchief, although what it cost her to do so can scarcely be imagined, and rose to her feet, unsteady, yet determined. She had scarcely attained the upright position when she heard a soft swish through the air. She was conscious of something long, sinuous, tremulous ?ashing before her eyes. Another second and a slender rope whirled over her head and slipped down over her shoulders. There was a sudden sharp constriction about her elbows. The loop was drawn close on the instant.
