Excerpt from The Herald of the Golden Age, Vol. 8: September, 1903 I noticed the drovers did not strike the animals, they probed them with their sticks, which had short spikes in the end of them they being limited to time, and the slaughter men, like Oliver Twist, calling out for more, the men have got to use the quickest means to perform their tasks. I then went down a dismal covered roadway under the buildings, leading to the slaughter-houses. Each slaughter-house has got two doorways at either end of it; at the opposite end to that where I was standing were the two doorways that led into the pens in which the bullocks were standing. No doors were needed to prevent the animals from entering the slaughter-house, if. There were any they were not used, the poor victims are allowed to stand and watch all that is gozng on, the poleaxing, skinning, and disembowelling of their fellow-victims. Boys and youths are employed to sweep up and wash down, and in some cases the blood is swept between the legs of...
