Excerpt from Speech: Delivered Before the Overseers of Harvard College, February 3, 1825, in Behalf of the Resident Instructors of the College, With an Introduction The principles maintained in the following speech seem to me important, not merely to the prosperity of the college at Cambridge, but to that of all similar literary institutions in our country. The resident instructors of a college are its proper representatives. No other body should intervene between them and the public, to take from them this character. They, and they alone, should stand forward before the community, as accountable for the state of the institution. All the powers, therefore, which properly accompany such responsibility, should be fully and explicitly given them. They should be intrusted, in the first instance, with the government of the institution, considered as a literary establishment; under the supervision and ultimate control of the community, for the benefit of which it is intended, and to which, in the nature of things, it belongs. This supervision and control, the community must of course exercise through its representatives; and in regard to the college at Cambridge, the Overseers are a body so constituted, as to be proper representatives of the community. The resident instructors, as immediate governors of a college, and the public, for which they labor, under whose direction they should be, and to which they should be responsible, are the only two parties properly concerned in the management of such an institution.
