Excerpt from The Wonderful Teacher: And What He Taught It is a singular fact that, whatever may be thought of the Messianic claims of Jesus, his preeminence as a teacher of truth and morality has been commonly conceded by fair-minded men. On one occasion the members of the Sanhedrin, learning that he had returned to Jerusalem despite their oft-repeated warnings, sent a detachment of soldiers to arrest him. They found him in Solomon s Porch preaching to the people and, unfortunately for the success of their errand, they paused to listen. Presently they returned empty-handed; and to the inquiry of their masters, Why have ye not brought him? they could only answer, Never man spake like this man! A strange report to be entered on the record of that judicial body. Yet all history abounds in such involuntary tributes paid to the eloquence of the Man of Nazareth by those who have gone forth against him. If it cannot be said of Josephus the Jew, Julian the Apostate and Celsus the Satirist, that they went to scoff and remained to pray, it is indisputable that they frankly recognized the transcendent merit of Christs teaching. Spinoza, the father of modern pantheism, says, Christ was the temple of God; since God has most fully revealed himself in him.
