While these proceedings were pending a new influence intervened. The wife of Pilate sent him a special message: Have thou nothing to do with that just man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him. The Roman law, while it did not prohibit the governors of provinces from taking out their wives with them, did discourage the practise. Nothing is really known of Pilate's wife except what is told us here. An old tradition, however, says that her name was Procla or Claudia Procla. She has been canonized under that name by the Greek Church. Her warning words no doubt made the vacillating governor more doubtful still about pronouncing judgment against Jesus. The dream was not likely to be disregarded by him as a Roman living in an age and...
