Kombinierte oberflächen- und volumensensitive spektro-mikroskopische XMCD-Untersuchungen nanopartikulärer Hybridsysteme

By Daniela Nolle

Cuvillier Verlag Jul 2012, 2012. Taschenbuch. Condition: Neu. Neuware - Magnetic materials and their applications represent one of the most important research areas in modern science. Particularly, nanostructured materials arouse great interest, as they exhibit new and interesting properties, which arise from quantum mechanical effects due to their nanoscale size. For example, by utilizing contributions to the anisotropy energy induced from a high surface to volume ratio or interactions at interfaces, one can create highly specialized nanostructured sample systems. Today they are already used in medical applications, like hyperthermia, or as MRI contrast agents. Possible future applications are e.g. self organized patterned nanoparticulate materials in new magnetic data storage media with higher storage densities. Especially magnetic nanoparticles made of iron oxide or with an iron oxide shell have attracted great attention in life science due to their easy dispersion in water and their biocompatibility. In the case of self-organized superlattices formed from single nanoparticles, possible applications include miniaturized components like GMR/TMR-elements. For all these dedicated applications, the magnetic as well as the non-magnetic properties have to be understood very accurately and tailored during the fabrication process. This can be achieved e.g. by varying the size and the composition of the particles...
