The author rarely speaks his sermons precisely as, he has written them. Influx is proportioned to eflux. Good or ill reception in an audience wonderfully opens or shuts up a public speakers mind. And he has found new trains of thought suggested in the pulpit, which had never presented themselves in the study; or written thoughts have widely expanded, or run in varied channels, in delivery; according to the auditory s peculiar states of receptivity. In the present instance, he was led repeatedly into extemporaneous remarks, which, evaporating with the heat of somewhat fervid feeling, it has been impossible for him to recal in the cooler and calmer moments of reflection since. Yet he has wished to present at least the substance of those extemporaneous remarks in the printed discourse: and as prolixity is not so objectionable in one that is to be read as in one that is spoken, he has greatly extended what he said in answer to the senatorial argument against african slavery in this country being an evil. He has also put in those parts of the written discourse which had to be omitted for want of time. And he has added a few bottom notes. Moreover, he has printed the discourse on pica instead of small pica type, as he proposed in his circular for subscriptions. These causes have a good deal swelled its size...
