I have spent much time on the hills in the compiling of this work, but there are certain days which live in the memory with singular vividness. For instance, a friend and I once passed a night at an eagle s eyrie far up a lonely glen, in the hope of being able to photograph the mother bird with the first rays of the sun. Perhaps the most interesting days of my experience have been spent at the summer haunts of the snow bunting, often at a height of over feet above sea level, where a snow fall may be looked for during any month of the twelve. On one occasion I penetrated to the nesting haunt of the snow bunting at dead of night - guided by the uncertain light of the moon - and as I lay on the hill-side the song of the snow bird was home across the corrie on the still air at exactly an hour and five minutes after midnight. Very wild and beautiful were the notes of the mountain singer as he greeted the dawn at an hour when the glens were still wrapped in gloom, and I was fully appreciative of the privilege I enjoyed in listening to his song. Another expedition which I recall was made to the high hills during the summer of 1909, with the intention...
