Excerpt from The Curriculum of the Model and Training School, Vol. 7: August, 1919 Since the making of an elementary school curriculum is merely an effort to print a fairly adequate statement as to the materials and methods used in directing children through a period of living and learning, with added exhibits of results and of the mechanics of some of the processes used in getting these results, it is important that an effort should be made beforehand to indicate the ideas back of this curriculum making. The principal idea back of this particular curriculum is that of synthesis, - not of a series of compromises but of a genuine synthesis of necessity and of aspiration. The ideal home achieves a synthesis of the lives of the children in the home, interested chiefly in their play, and the lives of the grown-up members of the family, interested chiefly in their several vocations. This ideal home is the best place possible for both the grown-ups and the children. Each group is better because the presence of the other compels ever...
