Schuylers Thoughts 317 him to march straight on, deaf as a hatchet, through a jungle of entangling perplexities. His mind lost its way in the mazy question of propriety and the still mazier question how Congress might, could, should, and would handle the problems it involved. The gunpowder, guncarriages, and intrenching tools that he lacked came to be mainly psychological. At the same time, being a man of moods, beset on one side by people eager to advance, he became occasionally impatient for action. At such times he wrote the pressing letters to New York; but then, his resolution sicklied oer with doubt, he sagged away, and very possibly, without realizing it himself, found the lack of supplies and the bare possibility of being prevented...
