At Hirsau, at the Abbot s, there turns the good knight in, To the organ s swell he drinketh the pleasant cloister-wine; Then on thro the pinewood gallops the verdant vale unto, Where Enz fierce-struggling rusheth his rocky channel through. In the market-place at Wildbad stands a stately house of stone, --Its sign, a glittering halbert, suspended is thereon; There lights the Count from horseback, there takes he sweet repose, And daily to the fountain as a knightly guest he goes. And when he hath undress d there, and rested for a minute, And said his paternoster, then steps he deftly in it, --Sits down on the spot exactly where from the riven rock The noble spring out-welleth with fullest, warmest shock. A wounded boar that wash d his wounds, beclotted all with blood, First to the hunter s ken betray d that fountain in the wood; Now tis th old warrior s pleasant pastime every summer s day His scarr d limbs to stretch out there, while the waters o er them play.--But springeth one fine morning his youngest page in thither: -- Lord Count! from the upper valley a troop down riding hither! Heavy maces bear they--a rose of golden red, And a wild-boar of the forest, on their captain s shield...
