Excerpt: . . . 12 ering the cost of emissions reductions requires speeding up the development and de-ployment of technologies that will fundamentally improve the way we produce and consume energy - such as the capture and storage of carbon dioxide emitted from coal-fired power plants; more affordable nuclear and gigawatt-scale renewable power; biofuels, electric, natural gas, hydrogen, and other clean alternatives to pe-troleum; and greater energy efficiency. In the absence of technology and cost ad-vances in these areas, reducing global emissions on the necessary scale will be im-possible without significantly sacrificing economic growth globally. 2 PROMOTING INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION ON CLIMATE CHANGE. President Bush has repeatedly highlighted the importance of international co-operation in developing an effective and efficient global response to the serous, com-2 plex and long-term challenge of climate change. Under President Bushs leadership, the U. S. has brought together nations to tack-le jointly clean energy technology and climate change challenges. As shown in At-tachment 2, 102 nations and the European Union are participating in these bilateral and multilateral collaborations. Since 2001, the United States has initiated a broad array of bilateral and multi-lateral collaborations focused on achieving practical results that can accelerate de-velopment and commercialization of new technologies, advance climate change science, and address deforestation and adaptation to climate change. These include 3 15 bilateral climate partnerships with key countries and regional organizations, as well as multilateral technology partnerships, such as the Asia-Pacific Partnership on Clean Development and Climate (APP), Carbon Sequestration Leadership Forum (CSLF), Group on Earth Observations (GEO), Generation IV In.
