Brand New Book. Excerpt from Cultivation of Neglected Tropical Fruits With Promise, Vol. 7: The Durian Many efforts have been made to introduce the durian to the Tropics of the Western Hemisphere. Because the seeds are short lived, only potted seed lings have succeeded in shipments of plants, and predictably only in the high-rainfall areas of the Americas. The first durian to fruit outside Asia was in 1894 in Dominica (lesser Antilles) from plants sent from the Kew Botanical Gardens, England These trees were the source of plants for subsequent introductions to Trinidad, Jamaica, and other Caribbean islands. Today there are many fruit bearing trees in the American Tropics, especially in dooryards of knowledgeable plantmen and in the few botanical collections of the region, such as the Lancetilla Experimental Gardens in Honduras. There are, however, no large orchards or commercial plantings. The reception of the durian in the American Tropics has been mixed, many people spurning it at first because of its strong smell, but an increasing number...
