Laugh out-loud funny by a master storyteller summarized the book's editor, a novelist herself, plus literary instructor and proof editor. For readers who laughed through Mark Twain's and Joseph Heller's portraits of two pivotal generations comes a satire of a third pivotal generation in the 1950s. The kids of those WWII heroes who saved us from The Great Depression, Nazi Germany, and Japanese invaders, grew to accomplish rock n roll, souped-up hot rods, the bop, and became the 60s rebels who would change American values forever. In 1950s West Texas, Tim and Hect, two teenage mischief-makers, find their world turned upside down when their game of war turns into a ghastly murder, or so they believe. In an attempt to set fire to an abandoned shanty in a forgotten auto junkyard, or so the two boys believed, they fill up a bottle with gasoline from a wrecked truck and hurl a Molotov cocktail. The tiny office erupted in a fireball. Their joy is shot lived, however, as both boys gape in horror at a blazing figure that appeared in the window. Whether a bum sleeping it off, an actual worker, or merely someone at the wrong place at the wrong time, who knew? Interrupted by the sound of sirens coming from town, and fearing their prank will land them a seat on Sparky, Huntsville's infamous Death Row electric chair, Tim and Hect have no choice but become fugitives from the law. Armed only with a dogged determination and a forehead-slapping sense of naivete, the boys flee into the harsh West Texas desert. Because of their spoiled lifestyles, the two couldn't be less prepared...
