Abstract.--Precipitated apatite and layered claylike apatite occur in the weathered and crudely reworked residuum of the Hawthorn Formation and are sources of some pellets and pebbles reworked into the overlying Bone Valley Formation. The occurrence of both types of apatite demonstrates that the phosphate pellets are not principally of fecal origin. The residual zone underlying the Bone Valley is characterized by rapid alternations of quiet-water sedimentation and turbulent reworking. The immaturity of first-cycle elastics derived from this littoral environment suggests that the well-rounded pellets that occur in the Hawthorn and Bone Valley Formations are the products of more extensive reworking. Many marine phosphate deposits are composed of nodular or pelletal apatite which, by virtue of internal structure or texture or the petrography of its setting, can be ascribed to primary or early diagenetic origins. However, the phosphate pellets of the Hawthorn and Bone Valley Formations, in the land-pebble district of central Florida, are petrologically ambiguous. They are distinguished by derivative textures, and show little evidence of primary deposition. They lack (1) the spherulitic structure of the concretionary phosphates in the Cretaceous shales of Montana (Pecora and others, 1962) and Wyoming (McConnell, 1935), (2) the agglomerate or accretionary textures shown by the oolitic phosphate like that in the Phosphoria Formation (McKelvey and others, 1953) and the Karatau deposits in Kazakhstan (Bushinsky, 1964); and (3) the filled protozoan tests of the North African phosphorites (Cayeux, 1939). PETROGRAPHY OF THE PELLETS The...
