Excerpt: . chapter ii. exigencies and fatal consequences ob the botal wab--the bepublicans. In the Genesis of facts Logic is inexorable; nor can it be falsified either by the Utopias of Moderates, or by the calculations of an oblique policy. In politics, as in every thing else, a principle inevitably involves a system, a series of consequences, a progression of applications, easy to be foreseen by any one with common sense. Every theory has a corresponding practice. And reciprocally, if the generating principle of a fact be falsified or betrayed in its application, that fact is irrevocably condemned to disappear, to perish without development, an unaccomplished programme, an isolated page in the history of a people, prophetic for the future, but sterile in its immediate consequences. For having forgotten this truth, the Italian movement of 1848 ought to have failed, and did fail. The Italian movement was essentially national, a movement of the people endeavouring to define, to represent, to constitute its own collective life. It ought to have been supported, and to have conquered, by a people s war, by a war sustained by all the national forces from one end of Italy to the other. All that was calculated to bring into the field the greatest number of forces for this object, favoured the movement; all that tended to lessen their number was necessarily fatal to the end in view. A miserable dynastic project contradicted in every way the generating-idea of the movement....
