It would naturally be supposed such a series of unexampled services must claim a corresponding acknowledgment of preferment; but not so, in Jones's case, at least. Instead of preferment, he was sent back to the single command of the sloop Providence, by orders from Commodore Hopkins (January 14th, 1777), while Capt. Hinman, his junior by two, on the regulated list, was given command of the Alfred. The SOU of the ardent Scotchman was fired with indignation at such usage, and he resolutely remonstrated against the outrage, after the proofs he had given of his fitness for more responsible command. It is evident that his strongly-marked idiosyncracies, as well as the successful results of his operations, rendered him unpopular with his fellow-officers, who heartily hated his Scotch arrogance, and feared or envied his ability. In consequence, several of them undoubtedly were plotting against his advancement and his honorable fame. But, as treason is no treason in event of success, so Paul Jones was impermeable to the malice and envy of his mates in the service, owing to the splendor of his achievements....
