Excerpt: . . . in the subject phase of the judgmental, or tensional situation, in which reality assumes existential expression. If experience is interpreted, not in the subjective sense of the registration in the individual of an external environment, but is construed rather as envelopmental, i. e. , as embracing within the unity of its process the opposition of object and idea, then reality and experience are interchangeable terms. There is, however, a significant difference between this interpretation of experience, and experience conceived as my experience, and your experience. (Cf. chapters following and especially chap. V.) I. . moment when reality, through its inner strife and tension, is precipitated into an obstacle or object resisting immediate control, the idea, locating the disturbance, reviewing, surveying the situation in which the difficulty arose--in order to select and determine the materials and conditions within which reorganization can take place--reflects a...
