Excerpt from The Juvenile Instructor, Vol. 30: January 15, 1895 The city of Nagasaki is built upon the side of a hill facing the harbor. An idea Of the style of architecture adopted by the European population can be gained from the picture of the mission house. The houses are mostly built of wood, clay and cement, usually one-story high, surrounded with porches or verandas. Earthquakes are of such frequent occurrence on all the islands of japan that high houses are not safe, and the foreigners as well as the natives content themselves with one-story structures. There are, it is claimed, in this city of some inhabitants, Japanese priests, and some sixty temples. The temples are enclosed in gardens, and, together with the numerous tea-houses, they are the favorite public resorts Of the people.
