Rankin, D. D.; August 11th, 1872; With Supplement, March 24th, 1892 The duty of learning from the history and experiences of the past is often presented in the Scriptures. It is as reasonable too as it is scriptural; and on its observance the progress of the human race largely depends. No picture is more beautiful, no exercise more profitable, than that of the fathers and elders instructing the young in the things which have come to pass. Without this every age would beg in the world afresh, and the human family remain forever in its infancy. Convinced, as I am; of the great importance of the study of history and of its intrinsic interest to the thoughtful mind, it is yet with no little misgiving that I attempt to lay before you a some What detailed account of this church and congregation. The strong conviction that something of the kind is due alike to our forefathers, to ourselves and to posterity has long rested on my mind; but the assurance that much...
