While the United States achieves its national security missions by equipping its military forces with the best weapons systems in the world, questions continue about the performance of the defense acquisition system. How effective is it How can that effectiveness be objectively measured Can we use those measures to affect behaviors with appropriate incentives or determine which policies and procedures improve results and which turn out to be misguided Answering these questions requires more than opinion. It requires analysis of unbiased data to discover insights into underlying effects. These, in turn, will inform better policy and programmatic decisions. This is the first in a series of planned annual reports on the performance of the defense acquisition systemits programs, institutions, workforce, managers, executives, and industrial partners. By using objective data and analysis to measure performance, these reports will identify underlying drivers and inform future decisions on programs, policies, and processes. This first report focuses primarily on performance related to Major Defense Acquisition Programs (MDAPs). The report focuses on more in-depth indicators of system outcomes, particularly with respect to cost and schedule, and does so by looking at various institutional trends. How does the portfolio of major programs perform over time What has changed, how, and by how much Are there differences associated with leadership Are there differences among DoD organizations Are there differences among our industrial partners This report also reflects results to date from the compliance of the Department of Defense (DoD) with the Improve Acquisition Act of 2010 on performance assessments of the defense acquisition system. While similarly motivated, our efforts will go beyond the specifics of this act to seek additional insights for improving the performance...
