Climate change is a global change in weather patterns. That change has been amplified by unnatural human interference in every phase of nature's delicate balance. It affects every single thing we do, every single day of our existence. Because its impacts at this point are somewhat uneven, because it has not yet personally affected enough influential legislators, because most of us are preoccupied with our day-to-day survival, we as a people have chosen to ignore the pending crisis. There remains doubt among many people about the validity of the claim, so they sense no pending danger. With very little investigation, they would find three truths: 1) Climate change is a well-documented, academic, scientific, observable, and verifiably reality. (97.1 percent of scientific studies concur.) 2) Climate change is directly caused by human interference in nature's balance. (CO2 up 50 percent in the last decade alone and the hottest ten years on record have occurred in the last twenty years, topping out in 2015.) 3) Climate change is an immediate threat; an omen of a long ranged catastrophe. (Habitable and arable dry land: health, breathable air, potable water, the economy and national security are all risk.) Thom Shipley's book explains the fundamentals of climate change, its effect on the food chain, and the threat it poses if left unchecked. Its intent is to inform and encourage the next generation of activists.
