Excerpt from The Past and the Present: Semi-Centennial Address to the Alumni of Yale College, and Graduates of 1814, at Their Annual Meeting, July 27, 1864 I cannot but feel that a kindred emotion animates the time worn Class of 1814, that has to-day come home to these academic shades, to evoke, from the sleep of half a century, its own youthful image, to retrace and recover its early lineaments, to catch once more its lights and shadows, and fondly to reproduce and cluster around it some at least of the external accessories, which gave to that young life its form and features. The stream of time, embraced within this interval, is surely long enough to have become historical. It includes more than a fortieth part of the nineteen centuries of the Christian era; for it is now fifty years since our Class, then eighty-two in number, went forth from this honored seat of learning, to bear its part in the great drama of American life, to march onward and forward with the young Republic of the Western World. The wayfaring has been long and sometimes weary. Our path, at times, has been strewn with thorns, or darkened by sorrow. Nearly two-thirds of the youthful band have fallen by the way but, in God's kind Providence, a goodly remnant has been allowed cheerfully and hopefully to reach the present eminence, permitting a moment of repose in which to survey the wide spread and varied landscape it has left behind. To the youngest of these survivors, the undue partiality of loving friends has committed the task of sketching, however imperfectly, the leading outlines of this historic picture. If he...
